"How to Stay Young and Beautiful!" Who could resist such a subject?

Well, I couldn't. So I sat through the entire 60 minutes of a recent "Open End" with David Susskind and four guests who make a living selling youth and beauty: a girl who teaches yoga in Boston, a plastic surgeon, a lady who runs a health spa in Southern California, and a doctor who specializes in procaine injections to soothe the nervous system.

One look at the group was an invitation to tune out. The plastic surgeon had a double chin, the health spa lady was chubby, and the procaine specialist looked like the statue of a dead Pope. The yoga teacher was an exception. When she finally came down out of a head-stand, she was an excellent ad for both youth and beauty, largely because she was young and beautiful to start with; this helps.

THE PLASTIC surgeon showed some before-and-after photos of two of his lady patients. Unfortunately, I had some difficulty telling which was "before" and which "after." (In the magazine ads, you can always distinguish between the two, because the "after" is smiling and has make-up.) And he lost me immediately after he referred to his bust operation as "breast augmentation."

He said: "A flat chested woman feels like an incomplete woman." (You can't expect much sense on this subject from a man who's selling augmentation.)

"Is there any danger in silicone injections for this purpose?" asked Susskind.

"Danger? Well, perhaps..."

The doctor who was selling procaine injections ("It's another word for novocaine," he explained) didn't make any sense at all. In answer to Susskind, he said he was 75. He looked at least 80, I would say, and a very bad ad for procaine. Although he DOES ski.

CLEARLY THE two women had the right idea about youth and beauty, particularly the yoga lady, who looked like the models in the corset ads who don't need corsets. Although her almost militant tranquility would be maddening after prolonged exposure to it, she was my favorite.

"Vitalizing comes from within," she said. "A person isn't transformed from without — only battered... Mental rest is the basis of yoga. We think people think too much."

This I hadn't noticed. Not on television anyway.

The lady from "The Golden Door" health farm believes in rigorous exercise, diet and money — in that order. At $500 plus per week, she gives a select few something to think about for the other 51 weeks of the year — like:

"WHEN THEY learn that a piece of pie costs four hours of exercise, they cut out the pie," she said brightly, thinking of the money she saves in chefs.

"We get them up at 6 in the morning. Breakfast is half a grapefruit and a cup of coffee... One man said it is just like the Army."

"What about the Swiss doctor that people go to?" asked Susskind. "He does things with lamb cells."

"It's called cellular therapy," said the procaine man. "It's a very delicate technique. You have to have a herd of special lambs, of

Teacher Offers Time, Place for Discovery

Students with a scientific bent at Howard Wood Elementary School are being given an opportunity to explore their area of interest in an enrichment class geared toward offering "a time and place for exploration," according to Winston Wessock, teacher.

Each afternoon for one hour a group of would-be scientists ranging from second graders through eighth graders gather in Wessock's classroom to work on individual projects.

than to work for grades, Wessock states.

Older students use their time to prepare experiments to share with younger classes. For example, when a fourth grade class studied air pressure, an eighth grader in the enrichment class prepared an experiment to put on in the fourth grade classroom. Projects being investigated by students in the enrichment class have included: changing liquids to gas, constructing a model heart capable of pumping, growing bean plants with various chemical sources, plant circulation, plant growth under different lighting conditions, kinetic energy, electric projects, and magnetic properties.
